Hicham — this is CRESTA, the house of your life, designed from the ground up for a Malibu crest.

Open the concept book first. It's the story of the house told in the order you'd walk it: the hilltop that looks both ways, the one idea — a low bar of board-formed concrete and oak bent into a shallow V under a single roof — and every room, carried by the commissioned imagery. It's the object you keep, show, and dream over.

The floor-plan set is the instrument you hand your architect: seven sheets, drawn to scale and dimensioned, ARCH D. It carries a full sheet of site criteria — buildable envelope, orientation, setbacks, defensible space — so this design transfers cleanly to a real ~3-acre lot the day you buy one. It's marked conceptual and not-for-construction, with the consultant team named, ready to go across a table as-is.

The walkthrough film is the dream itself — one minute inside, up the drive with the ocean withheld, and the moment the whole west wall becomes the Pacific.

The hero frames — the ocean face, the great room, the terraces, the bath, the canyon side, the wellness level — are all in the kit too.

One honest thing to hold, and hand your architect along with it: everything here is commissioned concept work, the house designed before a lot exists, so there's no photograph of a built structure. The imagery and film convey the design faithfully; the dimensioned plan set is the buildable document. That combination — a vision your architect can feel and a drawing they can build from — is exactly what you asked for.
